Hate New Music: The Classic Rock Manifesto is a passionate defense of classic rock and a scathing indictment of modern music. Author Bob Lefsetz, a lifelong classic rock fan, argues that new music is simply not as good as the music of the past. He blames this decline on a number of factors, including the rise of technology, the decline of music education, and the loss of a sense of community among musicians.

Lefsetz is not afraid to name names. He calls out Justin Bieber, Taylor Swift, and Kanye West as examples of what's wrong with modern music. He also criticizes the music industry for its focus on profit over quality. As a result, Lefsetz argues, new music is often soulless and unoriginal.

Hate New Music is a must-read for any classic rock fan who is tired of the state of modern music. It's a passionate and well-argued defense of the music we love.
